

tissue characterization of the pdf

Tissue characterization may be defined in its purest form as the identification of one or more physical parameters of a small volume of tissue that are sufficiently well correlated with the type or condition of the tissue that the measurement of these physical parameters may alone be used as an effective index of the type or condition of that volume of tissue.

Preliminary results demonstrate that this multiparametric tissue characterization helps to better differentiate among neoplasm, edema, and healthy tissue, and to identify tissue that is likely to progress to neoplasm in the future. This has been validated on expert assessed tissue. Conclusion.
